

Wisconsin School of Business Prepares Individuals with the Confidence to Inspire

At the Wisconsin School of Business, students benefit from a collaborative approach to education and graduate as business leaders poised to inspire confidence in their colleagues and partners.

“It’s not just showmanship or standing out and being an inspiring speaker,” says School of Business Dean François Ortalo-Magné. “It’s about this quiet ability to inspire confidence because of your expertise, your understanding of the ecosystem and your ability to collaborate.”

Wisconsin’s Weinert Center for Entrepreneurship is devoted to teaching students through service activities centered on launching entrepreneurial ventures, managing the risks of funding early-stage companies, influencing public policy, and moving science into entrepreneurship and accomplishing social goals.

“Our students are known to develop trusted relationships within a business network,” Ortalo-Magné says. “They are driven by the best interest of the organizations and of their clients.”

Wisconsin’s network of some 40,000 alumni exemplifies the school’s emphasis on relationships. The MBA program’s philosophy of specialization creates an environment in which passionate people form a community of deep interest—one that carries over into the professional realm for years to come.

“People will go out of their way to help one another,” Ortalo-Magné says. “That’s part of that trustworthiness and trying to improve the world. It’s not just about the business college. It’s about, ‘Hey we’re in this together, so let me help you. We will do something better if we do it together.’”

Depth of expertise, breadth of understanding and a collaborative approach to education add up to business leaders who can unleash human capital to transform the world.
